Fortunately, there are many explorers who have already been through this process and come with some very intelligent methods to identify what is essential to have in a backpack, day and case package for the Jamboree. The equipment in your backpack is the highest indicator of your preparation. One of the best ways to remember the rules to package is to experience that awesome moment when you arrive at the campsite just to realize that you have left something critical like toothpaste and a toothbrush or a piece of essential equipment to win your next plate, like a swimsuit. Forgetting an element of the scout uniform is equally serious, but the execution depends on the older leaders of the package. The best thing you can do is start early and keep working on a personal package list that you can depend on including everything you need for the type of camping trip you are doing. Backpack on a day trip does not require all the same emergency items as long-term camping. Time will also have an effect on what it brings. Read the full story about packing your equipment for a long-term campsite or a shorter trip for the next board. There are a lot of good tips out there, so we compile everything we could find; it's never too early to start working on your personal scout packing list. What is always essential for a camping checklist? There are some variations between the many different lists of critical camping items. Camping equipment such as the tent and several accoutrements related to it such as tent posts and a canvas, a sleeping bag and a pad, toiletries and covered for food are probably y y anol anu sonem la noc odarapery ratsE ebEd erpmeis ehcon al etnarud arouf recenamp odnaenal jAtse on dutis is osulcn ejav reiuluqac ne A type of sleeping bag in case you accidentally dropped out of the course or you can't return from the camp as soon as expected, or the sweatshirt may vary depending on the season and the planned activity. Undoubtedly, explorers must have a complete exploration uniform with them for long-term camping and jamborees. A poncho or impermeable is always wise to have and can be packed very well in general. The pajamas, underwear and good durable hiking boots or other shoes are absolute requirements. A hat, gloves and additional socks are likely to be useful and should be added to your camp checklist, especially if you plan to leave in the colder months or when the rain is likely to be equipped with a first aid kit, be filled with all the correct elements. The medicine that has not been outdated, bandages that have not been wet, and many insect repellents and ointments as sunscreen should be inside to be prepared for all occasions of non-emergency. A flashlight, a light bulb and additional batteries should also be included. A whistle to draw attention in case of a sudden accident and some safety pins to help put bandages in the first aid kit in numbers high enough to not get exhausted in case you need them. Unlike certain types of clothing and equipment to sleep, what is in the first aid kit should always be in the first aid kit. Replenishment of supplies after camp trips is crucial to ensuring that the next person who suffers from a treatable bite, cut or scrap is not forced to finish his trip for lack of first aid supplies. Anything you think can be useful can always be added to the packing list. It's better to add/remove when it comes to first aid supplies, but remember that this should only be for non-emergency. There's no way you're here, to take a whole ambulance with you, but work out what the things are that you wind up using every camping trip and you'll know what you should be packing. A The mess kit is one of the most frequently incomplete parts of a backpack.
